Orvan Grain Port holds ships as strike enters first week

[P1] Orvan Grain Port is holding vessels outside the harbour as a dock strike that began on 14 September continues.

[P2] Two grain berths are closed. The port is loading at reduced speed on the berths that remain open.

[P3] Several bulk carriers are waiting in the roads, according to port agents. Some have been diverted to other loaders.

[P4] Hammer Freight, a bulk operator, says it has moved ships to Vanir for wheat cargoes.

[P5] The port authority says it cannot estimate when normal working will resume.

[P6] The queue outside the harbour is being managed by the port authority, which is giving priority to vessels that were already on the berth list when the strike began. Agents say some owners have chosen to wait rather than divert, because a later cargo may still earn a better price than a substitute load elsewhere. Others have given up on the port for this month and are looking for grain in Vanir. The ministry has asked both sides to keep the port open for cargo already under contract.

[P7] The port authority has set up a waiting area for crews and has asked agents to keep vessel documents ready. It says safety is not affected. The ministry has not commented on the queue. Some buyers have begun to ask for rail alternatives.

[P8] Buyers in Midgard and Tolan have been told to expect longer delays.
